PASSAGE

Paris – Nearly two years have passed since France's then-foreign minister, Laurent Fabius, struck his gavel and declared: "The Paris agreement for the climate is ___(1)___ accepted." Next week, President Emmanuel Macron and the French government will host world leaders and non-state actors for the One Planet Summit. The purpose of this ___(2)___ protecting is to celebrate climate gains made since 2015, and to boost political and economic support for meeting the goals and targets of the Paris agreement. The Paris climate agreement, a historic feat of diplomacy that ___(3)___ adieus in a new era of international climate ___(4)___ infringement, was facilitated by a number of political and social forces. One of the most ___(5)___ influential of these was a group of more than 100 countries known as the "high ___(6)___ satisfaction coalition," which helped finalize the deal in the waning days of the 2015 United Nations Climate Change Conference (COP21). This ___(7)___ conforming coalition of leaders – from the richest countries to the most ___(8)___ conserve Pacific island states – broke a political ___(9)___ deadlock that had impeded climate progress for years, if not decades. As we reflect on that success, one thing is abundantly clear: the need for ambitious coalitions has returned. Strong global leadership on climate change scored a diplomatic victory two years ago, and today, new economic and political alliances are needed to turn those ___(10)___ assingments into action.
